The Shepherd on the Rock

Welcome to the Chamber Music Amici's Summer Concert series! It has been quite a wait since we launched a very successful summer series last year. I surely missed the beautiful pavilion and the park, seeing the families' and friends' happy faces, the breathtaking sunset accompanied the summer breeze, and even this slightly warm weather!

I am happy to share today's program. Both Shepherd on the Rock by Schubert and Mozarts's Kegelstatt Trio may be instantly recognizable as many people's favorites. Spohr's Six German Songs may be relatively unfamiliar, but they are exceptionally beautiful and emotionally charged master pieces. Please welcome the Soprano Jocelyn Thomas's debut with Chamber Music Amici. It will be an enchanting experience to hear her stunning voice tonight in this magical setting.

Program Notes

by Dr. Terry McQuilkin

Louis Spohr: Six German Songs, Op. 103, for soprano, clarinet, and piano

In 1837, Louis Spohr received a letter from his friend, clarinetist Simon Hermstedt, a musician in the court of Prince Günther Friedrich Carl II of Sondershausen, inviting the composer to write a set of songs for soprano with clarinet and piano accompaniment. The request came from Prince Günther's wife, Princess Mathilde, to whom the works were to be dedicated. Within a few weeks, Spohr composed a set of six songs, and for his efforts he received from the Princess a valuable ring.

Hermstedt was perhaps the most technically proficient clarinetist on the continent, and Spohr had already written four concertos for him. To capitalize on his virtuosity, the composer wrote dramatic, florid obbligatos for the odd-numbered songs in the group; the even-numbered ones display the instrument's lyrical qualities. The piano, on the other hand, is largely relegated to providing harmonic and rhythmic support.

The first five lieder are strophic in form – successive stanzas are set to the same music – while the last one is through-composed. Each lied has text by a different poet.

The stanzas of “Sei still mein Herz” (“Be Still My Heart”), alternate between gleeful and despondent moods, as the love-struck narrator tells of joy and anticipation, only to see all hopes vanish. Spohr illustrates the narrator's contrasting emotions by setting stanzas one and three in F major, and stanzas two and four in F minor. “Zwiegesang” (“Duet”) is a musical dialogue between a bird and a maiden. While the bird sings of the sunshine in spring, the maiden sings of love's joy. The lovely vocal line has a folk-like simplicity, while the clarinet imitates birdsong, to great effect. In “Sehnsucht” (“Longing”), which begins with a bravura clarinet figure, the singer expresses sadness at the impossibility of reaching a “distant world, effused with golden light.” In “Wiegenlied” (“Lullaby”), a gentle rocking piano accompaniment supports a vocal line that is confined to a mere three pitches.

The contrast of major and minor modes in “Das heimliche Lied,” (“The Secret Song”) conveys the narrator's shifting emotions: The first half of each verse is in G minor (the poet tells of “secret sorrows” and “quiet dying”), while the second part of each verse is in the parallel major (“peaceful meadows” and “gentle sleep”). In “Wach Auf,” (“Awaken”), the narrator urges the listener to cease brooding and enjoy the sounds of nature. As in “Zwiegesang,” Spohr uses the clarinet to evoke birdsongs.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart: Trio in E-flat Major for Clarinet, Viola, and Piano, K. 498

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart completed the Trio for Clarinet, Viola and Piano on August 5, 1786. The nickname, “Kegelstatt Trio” emerged from a notation that Mozart had written on a manuscript: “Vienna 27 July 1786 while playing skittles.” (Skittles is a type of bowling popular at the time, and “Kegelstatt” translates to “skittles alley.”) The manuscript bearing the inscription, however, was in fact for of a set of horn duets he had written a week earlier, and later publishers misapplied the moniker, either in error or to promote an endearing narrative.

The Trio was first heard at the home of the acclaimed botanist Nikolaus von Jacquin, whose son Gottfried was a close friend of Mozart’s and whose daughter Franziska was a favorite pupil of his. The trio is dedicated to Franziska, and she almost certainly played piano at the first performance. Mozart probably played the viola, and his friend and fellow freemason Anton Stadler, another frequent guest at the Jacquin residence, was most likely the clarinetist. (It was Stadler for whom Mozart would later write his Clarinet Quintet and Clarinet Concerto.)

The three instruments are more or less equal partners in the Trio. Rather unusually, all three movements are played at moderate tempos. The opening Andante, in 6/8 meter, is rather brief (a mere 129 measures) and in sonata form, with the secondary theme a derivative of the opening theme. In the very brief development and in the recapitulation, we hear a fair amount of four-part counterpoint with the clarinet, viola and each hand of the piano playing imitative passages.

The second movement is a minuet, with a stately opening section in B-flat contrasting with a pensive middle section in G minor in which the clarinet’s four-note chromatic motive is answered by a triplet figure played by the viola. Following the usual restatement of the B-flat major section, we hear a 15-measure coda that reprises those gestures from the middle section.

The final movement, marked Allegretto, is a buoyant rondo in E-flat. At the heart of the movement is an episode in C minor that begins with the viola delivering a rhythmically distinct figure composed of a minor-scale descent from G to C, a figure that is found – in major, not minor – in earlier Mozart works, specifically, the third movement of the Sonata, K. 485 and the Quartet, K. 169.

Franz Schubert: The Shepherd on the Rock, D. 965

The Shepherd on the Rock, possibly Franz Schubert’s last work, was completed in October 1828, a few weeks before his death. It was written for soprano Anna Milder, whose singing Schubert had admired ever since he heard her sing the title role in Gluck’s Iphigenia in 1813. She in turn grew to admire his music and asked the composer to write a piece for her that had considerable variety “so that several emotions can be represented,” specifying that the piece should have “a brilliant ending” and be “suitable for a large audience.” (She was, according to pianist and Schubert specialist Graham Johnson, “a prima donna assoluta.”)

Milder had suggested a Goethe text, but Schubert instead gleaned texts from three different sources: The outer sections of the tripartite work use poems by Wilhelm Müller; the words of the middle section are presumed to be by Helmina von Chézy. The work's length, its sectional nature and the inclusion of a clarinetist – whose role is as central as that of the singer – make The Shepherd on the Rock sui generis among Schubert's works.

The narrative voice is that of a young shepherd (the use of a female voice to depict a male character is not at all inconsistent with Schubert's past practice), who stands on a high crag, viewing the expansive valley and bemoaning the great distance separating him and his beloved. In the middle section, he bemoans his fate, but with the anticipation of spring, his joy returns.

Schubert had effectively used the clarinet as an obbligato instrument in earlier works, including his offertory, Totus in corde languet (1815), and some of his operatic arias. In The Shepherd on the Rock, the clarinet's role is decidedly central. (The piano's role is largely supportive.) Following the piano's foreboding six-bar introduction in G minor, the clarinet flips the harmony to B-flat major to introduce a cheerful melody that the singer soon takes up. The major arpeggios that are the building blocks of this expansive melody are unmistakably akin to yodeling. In the doleful middle section in G-minor, the singer's compass is much more constrained, and the clarinet moves to the background. In the final section – the homage to spring – both singer and clarinetist have a chance to display their technical bravura.
